The political regularity is that the party of the President has always lost votes in aid term Congressional elections relative to its Congressional vote in the previous elections the economic regularity is that Republican administrations exhibit below average economic growth in the first half of each term and Democratic administrations are associated with above average growth in their first half In the second halves economic growth is similar under the two administrations. We provide a rational expectations model which can explain these two regularities. In Presidential elections voters have to choose between two polarized candidates mid term elections are used to counterbalance the President's policies by strengthening the opposition in Congress Since presidents of different parties are associated with different economic policies our model predicts a spurious correlation between the state of the economy and elections The predictions of our model are in sharp contrast with those of traditional retrospective voting models in which voters simply reward the incumbent if the economy is doing well immediately before the election Our empirical results suggest that our model performs at least as well and often better than alternative models In addition we question previous claias that voters are short sighted and naively backward looking AMERICAN JOURNAL OF POLITICAL SCIENCE: VOL 44, NO 4, OCTOBER 2000 ,2000 Israel, Selected Issues ,2007 Social Cleavages, Political Institutions and Party Systems Heather Marie Stoll, 2004
