This article evaluates the successfulness that replanting mangrove areas would have post the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami and discusses the impact that the tsunami had on shrimp farming businesses. The study uses past evidence from Thailand, a country that was heavily affected by the tsunami, and one that has previously implemented mangrove replanting schemes, as well as a survey of four coastal Thai villages about whether individuals would participate in the replanting scheme. Past replanting schemes showed failure because such large replanting schemes lacked incentives for participation from the local coastal communities. Limitations of this research are that each village surveyed had a very small sample size, Ban Sam Chong Tai having the largest of 55 people surveyed. This limits the validity of the experiment. Another limitation is that two of the four villages surveyed have large shrimp farm businesses, causing bias that not many locals would participate in replanting mangrove ecosystems and is not a good representation of all coastal villages. Another limitation is that the information about the impact of agricultural businesses come from secondary sources. This could cause bias in the article as it is not known if some information is taken out of context. This article is relevant to my research as it outlines prevention techniques of the impact of Tsunamis, the agricultural effects of tsunamis, as well as the communities responses to the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami.

This paper from the Wildlife Trust of India and International Fund for Wildlife Care aimed to understand the impact of tsunamis on wildlife. Two case studies were carried out, one focussing on areas inhabited by mammals (deer, blackbuck, etc.), and in areas with the highest rate of human deaths as a result of the 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami. The east coastline of India was chosen, which was then divided into 23 segments of 50km each. The focal coastal village was chosen in each segment where ecological impacts were assessed and data sheets were filled from direct observations of scientists, as well as interviews being conducted with the locals. The article goes into depth about many species and the impact the tsunami had on them, however the main results showed that littoral forests were the ecosystems most impacted by the tsunami with many invasive species inhabiting the ecosystems post tsunami. The paper also found that many fish species were
