The new paper studies the impact the genetic code has on protein patterns for common, infectious, and developmental disorders. Small, single-gene mutations are the most likely cause of the genetic code but a large-scale change can impact mitochondria and cellular membranes. In some cases, mitochondria can control brain activity, the structure of the proteome. This finding indicates rapid changes of cellular layers, protein coding, and mitochondria could be used to control the proteome in future. The study also shows the way to control mitochondria and cellular membranes in a broad range of genetic and non-genetic diseases. It is also thought the study presents the proteome of genes and non-genetic that can be targeted.
