

Models of Speaking and the Assessment of Second Language Proficiency

Peter Skehan

Chinese University of Hong Kong

This is an earlier version of the article which appeared as: Skehan, P. (2009c). Models of speaking and the assessment of second language proficiency. In A. G. Benati (Ed.), Issues in Second Language Proficiency (pp. 202-215). London: Continuum International Pub-Group.

Within applied linguistics, the assessment of oral second language proficiency has been explored in a way which is surprisingly detached from developments in a range of related areas, including second language acquisition, psycholinguistics, and our understanding of what is involved in the speaking process. It is the purpose of this article to explore the relevance for such proficiency assessment of theory in the area of first (and second) language speaking, and empirical findings in task-based performance. It will be argued that these two ancillary areas have much to contribute to how we design and evaluate oral assessment procedures.

Models of Speaking

The dominant model of first language speaking is that of Levelt (1989, 1999, Kormos 2006). This model proposes that there are three general stages in speech production, as shown in Table One.

Table One: The Levelt Model of First Language Speech Production

Conceptualisation (Message Level of Representation)
